How does the California Tan Sunless lotion works?

The self-tanning agent of the sunless lotion, which is in the form of Dihydroxyacetone (DHA), is actively spread on the upper layer of the skin. This does not increase skin melanin levels, which is known to darken the skin, but it does develop a brown coloring on the skin. It is a colorless sugar which comes to interact with the skin proteins at the upper layer of your epidermis. The reaction between the outer layers of the epidermis and the DHA produces the "non-enzymatic coloring".

The reaction will last for at least up to 7 days from the first application but with the proper post-application care and re-touching process, you will maintain the tanned coloring all year round.
