Tuscany consists of ten provinces, all of which are special in their own way. The land consists of about two thirds consistent hills, not mountains, but not flats. Suttle hills that accentuate the most dazzling sunsets one will ever see.

About a fourth of the land is mountains, which are not as travelled as the hills, or the rest of the land which is flat. The mountains are definitely the least seen, but not to be mistaken.

Out of all the provinces, Florence is the most populated, next to Prato, and then Livorno in a close third. The entire population of the land reaches into the millions.

Tuscany first started to pick up its history in the Bronze and Iron Ages, starting at around 1,100 B.C. A lot of controversy between religion was brought up in the early times of Tuscany, and eventually the land was essentially split into two.

Each province having it's own strength, for instance, one in banking, another having a dock, specializing in silk, and more. But that time is when Florence rose to the top as the cultural capital, and still holds the title for the most populated province.
