Article Body:

In the beginning when Mp3 first evolved in the music market, the majority of people had no or little use of them. But as the time passed, these players lost the popularity due to limited storage of data and short battery lives. But despite this unpopularity many computer programmers analyzed the potential of these devices as the files were much smaller but didn't lose its sound quality.

When the broadband came into picture, internet rose to its time heights and made it easier to get free access of the wealth of MP3 music that is on tap and online. Many bands also distribute their music to be distributed over the internet because of its potential to reach mass audience. Some of the music websites also find it great to launch their won websites to post demonstrations, articles and materials they find their visitors shall find interesting.

Any new band will also go any lengths to get their music heard and the internet provides you with many such ways. They also post information about themselves and their music online where visitors can either download or stream music.

Such websites are customizable and provide generous quantity of space and also allow personal connections to develop between bands and fans that follow them. Some bands also preview their new album exclusively allowing their fans to hear the material before it hits the store. This arrangement is very beneficial for the listener and the musician but sometimes bands find it a reason to loose sales and profits.

There is a notion that music sharing online shall exert a negative impact on the sales of CD which is not very true because recently a band has made all their material available on the website and instead of losing CD sales they earned huge profits.
