Is your computer acting funny? Are you having trouble surfing the web like you normally would? Is your computer slow, sluggish and unresponsive lately? Than you just might be the victim of adware on your machine.

Whats adware? It's usually some kind of software of free application that has been installed on your computer that either you or the manufacturer of your machine has put on your PC, that tracks actions on your computer, and reports those actions back to advertisers.

Sounds sort of like big brother watching you huh? Well you wouldn't be far from the truth. See, if your using any version of the Windows operating system, chances are very good that you already have adware installed on your machine. Why? Some applications and programs have it built in as a default. You have no choice whether it can be installed or not, because it's already there.

So what can you do? Simple. Get yourself a good adware removal tool, and with just a few mouse clicks, remove all the scumware and spyware from your machine. You can find some pretty decent free adware application tools out there, but if you want true protection, your better off spending a few dollars and purchasing one.

Here is a tip on how to find a good one. What you need to look for are adware removal tools that have been tested and rated by a reliable source. Look for a application that has a five star rating or better. Once you find one your happy with, you can usually try it before you purchase.

Now that doesn't mean that its going to repair all your adware problems for free, but it will give you a good indication of what its going to do before you purchase it. It's almost like taking a test drive, allowing you to get comfortable with it and try it out before hand.

Once you have removed all the adware on your system, you will find it to be almost as fast as the day you purchased it. No more spying and reporting on every little thing you do to those nasty advertisers. Let them bother someone else, and leave you with a clean, reliable machine.
